

Weekend as Community, Consumption, Colonization: Struggles over Liminal Time in 2 Days, 1 Night

Gazi Islam

► To cite this version:

Gazi Islam. Weekend as Community, Consumption, Colonization: Struggles over Liminal Time in 2 Days, 1 Night. M@n@gement, AIMS (Association internationale de management stratégique), 2016, 19 (2), pp.146-151. <hal-01403748>

HAL Id: hal-01403748

<http://hal.grenoble-em.com/hal-01403748>

Submitted on 27 Nov 2016

HAL is a multi-disciplinary open access archive for the deposit and dissemination of scientific research documents, whether they are published or not. The documents may come from teaching and research institutions in France or abroad, or from public or private research centers.

L'archive ouverte pluridisciplinaire HAL, est destinée au dépôt et à la diffusion de documents scientifiques de niveau recherche, publiés ou non, émanant des établissements d'enseignement et de recherche français ou étrangers, des laboratoires publics ou privés.

Weekend as Community, Consumption, Colonization: Struggles over Liminal Time in 2 Days, 1 Night

Gazi Islam
Grenoble Ecole de Management
gislamster@gmail.com

With this major shift in the location and working lives of the population came significant changes in lifestyle and consumption—the rise of a new way of life. Days and weeks were more clearly delineated into work time and home time...This was, perhaps, the birth of the hallowed “weekend.” (Florida, 2010:31)

Work in contemporary society is hidden. Work's products accumulate and fill the spaces of leisure with traces and memories of past labor. Yet, work, and workers, are both necessary and impossible in this accumulation; the memory of their efforts haunts consumer products like a premonition or a limit. This invisibility of work, like the modern subject itself, seems to exist outside of time, inhabiting another kind of time than the linear progression of objects that constitute its past. Symbolically positioned as the antechamber of subjectivity itself, the body and spirit of the worker are produced and repaired over the weekend.

The weekend is a liminal, paradoxical space, an ending and a beginning of production, a place where subjects are free to be themselves, yet are faced with the anxiety of empty time to fill by subjects alienated by the weakening of personal ties. Bereft of thick social relations, consumer goods fill the gaps as atomized tokens of individualized work processes. These objects act as talismans against the social void they obscure, sparing us the trauma of facing directly our lack of solidarity. When the demand to help those near us confronts us in the form of a plea, an accusation, or merely the questioning gaze of a work colleague, we realize we are unprepared to meet this demand.

A growing discussion is emerging around the relationality of individuals in work contexts, the relational subject, the people of organization. But what about the time of organization? If the workweek is the space of mundane ethics, the ethics of codes, rules and norms, of responsibilities, then the weekend has its own ethics, the messianic, liminal ethics of the sabbatical, where individuals ritualistically invoke the love behind the law. In the mythical space of work/leisure, if the workweek serves for the production of goods, the weekend serves for the reproduction of society. If the workweek works on standardized, linear time, the weekend comes to symbolize unstructured spontaneity. These two spheres co-constitute each other, the weekend giving meaning to the workweek, which frames and nourishes the weekend. Opposed, the two times exist in a tenuous balance.

I reflect on the timing of work and leisure in response to a certain uneasiness I felt when watching the film 2 Days, 1 Night (2 Jours 1 Nuit) by Jean-Pierre and Luc Dardenne, one Saturday afternoon, with the goal of relating the film to contemporary understandings of work and organizations. The prima facie relation was obvious – a film about a firing, a burnout, the roller coaster of contingent work, the theater of workplace democracy faced with the brutal reality of self-interest. I combed through the many work-related themes, from the personal to the societal, from anxiety to alienation, searching for the hermeneutic key that would reveal to me the complexities of modern work as portrayed in the film. Yet a lingering question remained with me – where was the work in this film?

I was struck, then, by the ironic fact that the film, a tour de force about working life, took place almost entirely on the weekend. It was right there in the title – 2 days, 1 night. The movie began just as the boss was leaving work, drew us inexorably through a Saturday and Sunday that seemed both endless and exhausting and yet all-too-quick, and ended at the beginning of the work week. I was left with the lingering question of why a movie whose focal point is labor relations would so obviously situate the action outside of the temporality of work, even taking the title of those few moments outside of the working week.

Despite the volumes that have been written about the intensification of work and the erosion of leisure, a quick search revealed that the weekend was a largely untheorized domain, perhaps an off-limits area where work considered taboo, at best a protected space whose social status had been won through historical struggle and whose subsequent erosion was a source of nostalgic lamentation. Perhaps scholars of work, I mused, had better things to do on a Saturday than write about the weekend. Watching a film, however, seemed to be a legitimate weekend activity, and I felt thus justified in using this film to enter into an exploration of the uses of leisure. Whether the film presented a welcome catharsis from the workweek, or a Trojan Horse bringing workplace issues into the leisure sphere, 2 Days 1 Night seemed to offer an experiment in cinematic representation that was worth exploring.

In the present case, it must be said that watching this film is far from leisure; a hard film to sit through, it enacts through its pace the slow but urgent ticking away toward a moment of confrontation – with one’s own demons, with one’s boss, and most of all with one’s colleagues. Each shuffle-step of Marion Cotillard’s hesitant moments of encounter presents us the dread of a woman who must face the judgment of her peers, as she demands the reinstatement of a social bond that has long been forgotten. Should she be expected to disrupt her colleagues’ hobbies, their shopping and drinking, their moments with their families, to stir up the injustice that they all face? Are her demands unfair, or just? As her colleagues ask her over the telephone or as she rings their doorbell – can’t this wait until Monday?

A Brief Interlude on the Weekend: Times and Divisions

The weekend is a modern concept, born out of nineteenth-century worker struggles in Britain (Walton, 2014). The establishment of the weekend as a limitation of work hours formed part of a larger shaping of work and leisure time that became a distinctive mark of modern society. The “spatio-temporal” ordering of modern life into work and leisure spheres included negotiations about the shape of the weekend and the “disciplining” of labor time (Ebrey & Cruz, 2014). This division, following Habermas (1981) became an important way of seeing modern life, as reflected in the separate spheres of an economic-productive “system”, on the one hand, and a phenomenal “lifeworld” of intersubjective meanings, on the other. The former became marked by an ever-increasing demarcation and control of time, as instituted by the imposition and regulation of clocks, whistles and other time-structuring devices, leading to a linear and “rational” approach to time. Yet, the cyclical time of “wakes and feasts” (Thompson, 1967: 76) was retained on the Sabbath, but was also seen as characteristic of archaic tradition, as well as non-western, “pre-industrial” societies (Evans-Pritchard 1969).

The division of time into the linear time of clocks and labor, and the cyclical time of events and festivals, was itself subject to a paradox. Labor time was to be increasingly structured, disciplined. Festive time was to be unstructured, based on pleasure and full enjoyment. Yet the distinction between the two itself rested on a fundamental structuring which constituted both categories. What could unstructured time consist of, if it was bounded into the structured whole within which it functioned as a catharsis? What leisure could a weekend be if we counted-down the moments until it was over? No sooner had the division between system and lifeworld, between production and meaning, been instituted than this division began to break down, a process described by Habermas in his discussion of the “colonization of the lifeworld”.

The paradox of a period of unstructured time within a structured work-life system could be explained as an ideological move to mask the nature of leisure as a support for the productive system, by clothing it in a guise of personal and social freedom. If, as Laclau (Laclau&Mouffe, 1985) stated, hegemony is the state where a part of a system masquerades as the whole, then ideology might be characterized by the illusion that a part of the system floats free from, sets limits to, or stands in opposition to the whole. The weekend was a time dedicated to replenishing personal energy, rebuilding family and social bonds, and preparing for the coming week. In other words, if the workweek was dedicated to production, the weekend was meant for social reproduction.

The institution of the weekend allowed workers to “let off steam”, largely through spending the disposable income accumulated through the week on consumption. As Peggy (2001:200) describes the alienation of working immigrants, “On the weekends, they go to the mall, where they can choose from a range of products so vast it is almost unimaginable. But work consumes them.” Leisure time, far from a way to find one’s freedom and enjoy the fruits of one’s labor, becomes an integral part of the work system, supporting increased performance and keeping workers satisfied enough to remain accommodated to their working conditions:

They are either getting ready to work... working..or recuperating from work (from exhausted weekends and too short vacations to retirement). Instead of the divorce of family life and leisure consumption from work we find that most such time is still shaped by work or geared to the reproduction of labor power (Cleaver, 2005:122)

The culture of weekend consumerism, far from a countercultural movement, positioned itself as a respite from and not a critique of workplace culture. Popular cultural movements progressively relaxed their oppositional stances to emphasize enjoyment and positive experience. As Goulding, Shankar and Elliot (2002) describe the transformation of oppositional cultures in music, “Punks, for example, adopted a highly visible and distinct code of dress and ideology which permeated everyday life. In contrast to this, rave, for the majority, is a “weekend” culture of hedonism, sensation and escape”.

In short, the “right” to the weekend was the right to a world made increasingly meaningless by its inability to locate itself in the production of common values. Personal liberty and enjoyment stood in as consolations for the lack of communal and political solidarities, consolations guarded jealously as the traces of an illusory respite from an alienation that became thereby more entrenched. Such spaces, soon seen as hedonistic “entitlements”, drained the social and political legitimacy of workers movements, which came to be seen as no longer standing for social solidarity but for self-interest. Such a situation was ripe for “reform”, and the slow erosion of weekends and other spaces of personal time, half expected, drew systematic protest only from the most stalwart of activist circles.

Contemporary workers often work on weekends. Online, on their phones, from home, the barriers between system and lifeworld, as described by Habermas, are becoming increasingly fluid. This reunification has been asymmetrical; work has invaded “life” more than the reverse, despite the proliferation of plush, colorful furniture and casual Fridays in many workplaces. Yet scholars have noticed that workers are often surprisingly relaxed, and often enthusiastic, about this reunification, and have taken to their new “entrepreneurial” roles with a surprising zeal. Perhaps a growing sense of fatalism, a willingness to embrace the new “realities” of the workplace with a pragmatic spirit? Perhaps, a case of ideological capture, where discourses of dignity and equality have become eclipsed by messages exalting the free market and individual choice? Or, perhaps as suggested above, the division between work and leisure was always wrought by a certain persistent contradiction, a feeling of bad faith in the value of the mini-freedoms recycled and anxiously guarded each weekend, not knowing what to do until freedom magically disappears 2 days, 1 night later. If that is the fate of weekends, then perhaps working over the weekend is not such a bad idea. Perhaps – but is another kind of work possible?

Out of time, out of joint

Faced with being rejected by her colleagues, after a divisive and unfair vote set up by her manager, Sandra appears at the last moment on Friday, just in time to secure a second vote on Monday. Reluctant to come in, her physical presence was necessary, because “once he saw you, it would be impossible to refuse a second vote.” Likewise, one by one, Sandra spends the weekend first telephoning, then physically appearing to face each of her colleagues, with her proposition/demand/plea that she be “reintegrated” into the social group.

The small universe Sandra traverses feels in the film like an odyssey through different islands of isolated, personal mini-worlds. Apartment complexes, corner stores, large isolated suburban houses, the multicultural, ideologically diverse, class-divided social fabric within which Sandra is seeking reintegration seems anything but integrated. As Sandra approaches each household, neither she nor the viewer have any idea what may await, filling Sandra with dread at each encounter and signaling the lack of community between the workers.

Sandra has no arguments. She wields no institutional levers, neither coercive power, nor legitimate reasons, nor economic incentives. Everything seems to work against her. She simply repeats – will you vote for me? An interruption of the system of rationality, it would seem that the weekend would be a good time for such an irrational demand. Largely, however, the weekend has been filled with alternate logics.

First, some colleagues avoid her encounter asking her to call back during the week. Sandra struggles with spouses, who seem reluctant to cede yet another moment to a work-related activity. The first house she visits sees a man absorbedly working on his woodwork, too involved and busy, and too cash-strapped to help. After all, they have to pay university fees, and cannot forego the bonus. Similarly, a colleague quickly entering her apartment with hands full of shopping bags, dismisses her off hand, saying that having left her husband she is forced to purchase all new appliances, television, washing machine, etc.. “everything”. Her first sign of support comes from Timur, who is coaching a sports team; coming off the field, Timur seems relieved to have the chance to change his decision. Perhaps not all hobbies are created equal.

Yet, by and large, those who support Sandra are those who seem themselves to be wrapped in household conflicts. Domestic violence and generational conflict mar the bread and circuses of the weekend, and flare as Sandra appears. As she solicits an older worker washing his car with his son, the man is attacked by the latter as he tries to listen to Sandra. Injured, with Sandra wracked with guilt, he pledges his solidarity. Later, Ann, an isolated wife in a surreally elevated suburban home, invites her in, but Sandra pauses saying “I’d like to but, I have work, uh, I mean, work”, referring to her continued weekend solicitations. Ann, wanting to help, fears her husband, who wants to use the money to build onto the terrace. She has to check with him, as he tears her away from the conversation. Ultimately, Ann breaks free to show her backing for Sandra. Rather than an inconvenience, these two latter individuals seem themselves to need support, and respite from their home lives, and together they build the beginnings of solidarity.

Such a basis, however, is insufficient to provide Sandra with the final vote. Tellingly, the last vote she needs involves a precarious worker, of African origin, who is on a temporary contract. Differently than the home life struggles of the other, this conflict involves the center of worklife itself, its temporariness and instability, and the struggle to give solidarity in the face of one’s own precarity. Solidarity for the others had involved supporting a colleague as a respite from home life; for Alphonse, the choice is to give solidarity in sacrifice of one’s own work. Yet Alphonse affirms that he will support her. This decision seems decisive, because ultimately Sandra herself is faced with the choice of sacrificing Alphonse to keep her own job, and it is this that most immediately precipitates her leaving the organization.

The sequence of encounters Sandra passes through leads her through different visions of the weekend, from a time of shopping and hobbies, through an anguished time of domestic strife, and finally to the intersectional shared suffering of workers more marginalized than herself. Each of these encounters constitutes an interruption of the normal course of the weekend, where she interrupts the everyday with a question, escaping timidly from her lips but with the ethical force of a demand for right. Some attempt to escape her demand – burdened with their own problems, they plead clemency; drunk and in denial, they aggress against her; too busy to speak, they ask her to come back during the week. But, it seems that those also in a position of suffering are willing to meet her in this moment of disjointed time, to try to set things right.

In Spectres of Marx, Derrida (1994) takes the theme of time disjointed, to interrogate whether it is not exactly in those times of irregularity, of disjointedness, that the search for new forms of society could take place. The break from homogeneous linear time has a mystical quality, one that can be used to ideologically cover the stark reality of material exploitation, and can thus serve powerful interests through a strategic reversal. Yet, this break can also open a space of insulation, where the meanings of work, solidarity and collegiality can be remade. Rather than “setting time right”, facing the impossibility of the present is a step toward rethinking a just society. Just as the performative break of fiction or performance, and the liminal space of the movie theater, can present a circus-show that makes us forget about our travails, or rather confront us with them in a moment where our defenses are down, inviting us to recreate our society out of this liminal space. As Sandra tries to patch together a social tissue between the workers, phone call by agonizing phone call, the Dardenne brothers drag us, scene by scene, through the modern wasteland of the non-work world and ask us to whom we will give our solidarity on Monday morning.

Cleaver, H. (2005) 'Work, Value and Domination. On the Continuing Relevance of the Marxian Labor Theory of Value in the Crisis of the Keynesian Planner State', The Commoner, 10: 115-131.

Derrida, J. (1994). Specters of Marx. Translated by Peggy Kamuf. New York and London: Routledge.

Ebrey, J. & Cruz, S.A. (2014). Working at the weekend: supermarket and shopping centre workers in Salford/Manchester (UK) and Porto (Portugal). Leisure Studies, 33(2), 233-246

Evans-Pritchard E (1969 [1940]) The Nuer: A Description of the Modes of Livelihood and Political Institutions of a Nilotic People. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Florida, R. L. (2010). The great reset : how new ways of living and working drive post-crash prosperity.

Goulding, C., Shankar, A., & Elliott, R. (2002). Working Weeks, Rave Weekends: Identity Fragmentation and the Emergence of New Communities. Consumption Markets & Culture, 5(4), 261–284.

Habermas, J. (1981). The theory of communicative action. London: Beacon Press.

Laclau, E. & Mouffe, C. (1985) Hegemony and socialist strategy, towards a radical democratic politics. London: Verso.

Levitt, Peggy. 2001. The Transnational Villagers. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Thompson, E. P. (1967) Time, Work, Discipline and Industrial Capitalism, Past and Present 38: 56–97.

Walton, J.K (2014). From institution to fragmentation: the making and unmaking of the British weekend. Leisure Studies, 33(2) 202-214.